We report a case of autochthonous endocarditis caused by a coagulase-negative Staphylococcus in a healthy male. A 31-year-old man presented with fever, back pain and was diagnosed as having osteomyelitis due to Enterobacter cloacae on the basis of blood culture and bone aspiration. On admission, mitral regurgitation was recognized on transthoracic echocardiography. The patient's condition worsened despite antibiotic therapy. Emergency surgery was performed to avoid progressive heart failure. Examination of the excised valve revealed thrombi on the valve leaflets and attachment of pathogenic bacteria to the valve surface. The patient had been admitted several times for physical therapy due to lumbago in recent years. Staphylococcus species, which cause endocarditis, are increasingly being reported. Endocarditis due to coagulase-negative staphylococci is relatively rare. Although the patient's previous illnesses were probably mild, it is speculated that the patient was the source of the S. epidermidis strain that caused endocarditis. Thus, it is important to consider the possibility of endocarditis in patients with symptoms of infection whose condition does not improve despite antibiotic therapy, even if they have a history of minor illnesses.A. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a video image processing device, more particularly to a device for detecting and correcting an image distortion in an image picked up by an image pick-up tube. B. Description of the Prior Art In a video image processing device, an image pick-up tube is usually disposed at an image forming position so that a main subject image is produced on a phosphor screen of the tube. The image is formed by the light irradiated from the object image or its image picked up on the phosphor screen. The image pick-up tube is usually provided with a filter for absorbing the rays, particularly in the infrared region, in order to prevent the phosphor screen from being deteriorated by the rays. The image pick-up tube is therefore provided with a shade for shielding the phosphor screen from the rays entering therethrough. In the image processing device, the image on the phosphor screen is picked up through the image pick-up tube and is processed with a video signal to obtain a video image signal. In a known video image processing device of the type referred
