There is a specific time for conception. It doesn't matter what your age. I've seen the term "birth control" used to refer to a whole spectrum of birth control measures that differ in dosage, frequency, mode of action, etc. depending on the situation. In the right situation and under the right circumstances birth control can be very helpful in controlling a pregnancy. But if you are concerned about passing on the herpes virus, waiting until after the time of conception to conceive is not going to eliminate the risk of passing on the virus. I will say that on the other hand, the act of unprotected vaginal sex does not pose any greater risk of passing on the herpes virus than having vaginal sex with a person who does not have the virus. But the big danger is not if you have herpes, but if you don't have herpes. If you never have it, then you won't get it from someone who has it, but if you do have it you can pass it to a person who does not. That is the risk. Your medical provider can perform a pregnancy test in the office. If you are trying to conceive and find out you are pregnant you can discuss options, birth control and screening. I'm 31 and had a baby girl at 27. Even though I had an undescended testicle until I was 13 and was on testosterone until I was 18 I decided to wait to get married and then have children. I was excited to become a mom and gave my husband the night before we were married. I was a virgin until my husband and I had sex and we had a baby. I had my husband and I get screened. He didn't know I had it but I asked my OB to take care of it with no problems. My husband is still young and enjoys the fact that I am the mom and he is excited about it. I am not embarrassed at all about my STD. It is a part of who 81e310abfb
